The Relationship Between Native North Americans and Plants

The primal, buzzing sound of a snake rattle vibrating under the scrub brush beside your feet is enough to stop anyone in his tracks—just as nature designed it. If you choose to stick around long enough to look for the source of the sound, you may be rewarded with the sight of a large-scaled, thick-bodied reptile. Slowly coiling on a bed of leaves, the snake would raise its head and upper body into a characteristic defensive pose as its dark tongue rhythmically darts, trying to smell the threat it senses from your presence.

Today we know that most people can safely watch this snake from a short distance. Few people encounter rattlesnakes in the wild, and fewer still ever suffer the effects of a venomous snake-bite. But suppose the worst did happen. Suppose the snake never heard your approach. Without time to react to you, a rattlesnake would not rattle its tail in alarm. Without that danger signal, you someone else." The failure of love is also the failure of others to be a positive reflection of who we think we are.

Love is something we want, yet, so many times, we refuse to give it ourselves. It is an expectation. Yet so few
